SHORT STORY

OF THE DAY.

From the Newsman Andrew French was one of those mortals who are so unfortunate as not to be dependent upon their own efforts for sup-

AN AIMLESS LIFE.

Having graduated at college, he passed two years abroad, and returned to his naland uncertain whether he would be a physician, a lawyer, or a minister of the gospel, for either of which vocations he deemed himself equally adapted. For "business" he had no inclination. As he lazily reclined in an easy chair smoking a fragrant cigar, his eyes fell upon the following "ad" in a paper of that day's issue which he had been reading:

day's issue which he had been reading:

"Wanted—Intelligent young man, of pleasing address, to canvass for the sale of a domestic article on commission. References required, but experience unnecessary. Call upon or address Brown & Co., 15 — street."

For a few moments he remained silent,
and then muttered:

"I am not destitute of intelligence, and think that I can be pleasing in my address," smiling as he spoke. "I wonder if it would not be advisable for me to confer with Brown & Co?"

He rose from his seat, started from the house, and wended his way to 15 street, where he learned that the "article" was a kerosene lamp appliance which increased the volume of light at the same time that it decreased the quantity of oil time that it decreased the quantity of oil He sasily-indeed, greatly to the satisfaction of Brown & Co., when they had acquainted themselves with his antecedents-secured a situation as canvasser, and the next day left the city on his bi-and the next day left the city on his bicycle.

The first place which he "worked" was a thriving village, where his sales were few, and, despite his uniform courtesy, he was subjected to the repulsive treatment which agents are wont to receive. His next venture was in a rural district, where the houses were far apart, and he "wheeled" many miles without being allowed to even show what he wished to dispose of, as he was usually confronted at the door by some one who said: "We are not prepared to purchase anything of the kind," or similarly. or similarly.
"I declare, I pity the poor fellows whose bread and butter depend upon work like this." he frequently remarked to himself, this," he frequently remarked to himself, laughingly.

Quite late one showery afternoon he reached a hamlet where there was no hotel, but he finally secured entertainment in a private family.

As he sat on the veranda of the house where he was temporarily domiciled, the first evening of his stay in the place, the tones of some one singing to the accompaniment of a piano were audible, and addressing his host-Thomas Marsh by name—with whom he had been conversing, he asked:

asked: "Who is possessed of such a wonderfully fine voice?"
"It is the daughter of a man who lives in that house," Mr. Marsh replied, indicating with his finger the house nearest his own, "who is fitting herself to teach music."

"I should think her already fitted to teach it—vocal music, at least," French observed.

For a few minutes he sat without uttering a word, and then he inquired:

"Are you willing to go with me a little nearer her house? I wish to hear her more distinctly, and were both of us seen by any member of the family I should not be deemed so impertinent as otherwise I wight."

I will conduct you into the room where she is."
"Will she not be offended if we go

She is not the kind of a girl who is so easily offended."

Ten minutes later French had been formally introduced to "Miss Stella Reid" by mally introduced to "Miss Stein Rear by Mr. Marsh, who sald:

"Mr. French heard you singing from my veranda, and desired to hear you at a less distance, so I invited him over here."
"That's It," she rejoined, a flush suffusing her counterpage. "That's it," she rejoined, a nush sunusing her countenance.
"Now, please to favor us with one of your best selections." Mr. Marsh remarked, as he and French seated themselves.
Without a word of objection she played and sang several pieces, for which her visitors complimented her. "Do you sing or play, Mr. French?" she aquired.

"A very little of both," was the reply.
"It will be no more than fair for you to ake my place at the instrument," she oberved, leaving the plano stool,
"I make no claim to musical ability, but dill reciprocate your kindness as well as eciprocate your kin

I can."

Taking the vacated stool, he played a fantusia so skillfully that she nervously

"I believe you are a 'professional."
"I assure you I am not." he rejoined.
"Now you must sing," she said.
In a mellow tenor he sang a selection from Mendelssohm, so pathetically that tears filled the eyes of his hearers, four in number, as his unknown voice had drawn her parents into the room.
"You may 'make no claims to musical ability,' but it is yours," Mr. Marsh tremulously observed, "and, having it, I do not understand how you came to be selling..."
"Sh!" fell from French's lips, and the sentence was not completed.
He rose from the stool, and was intromentence was not completed.

He rose from the stool, and was introduced to Mr. and Mrs. Reld.

"How long shall you remain in the place, Mr. French?" Mr Reld inquired.

"I cannot say exactly." was the answer.

"While you are here, I hope you will come in to sing and play as often as you can," fell from Mr. Reld's lips.

"You must, Mrs. French," the daughter enjoined in an earnest tone.

"Thank you; I shall be pleased to do so," he replied.

Thank you, I said be pleased to do so, he replied.

Soon after he and his host left the house, and on their way back to the latter's home he explained how he chanced to be following his present vocation, causing Mr. Marsh to laughlingly exclaim:

"Well, I declare!"

After breakfest the next morning he said breakfast the next morning he said

"I should like to remain here two or three

"As well as not." was the cordial reply.

"Thank you very much."

For two—yes, nearly six—weeks he was a member of Mr. Marsh's household, during which he discontinued his canvas-sing and passed most of the time with "Stella," as he soon came to address her, while he to her became "Andrew."

They sang—she to him, he to her, or together; they played for each other, or duets, often having quite an audience. They rode, rambled, read together, until—what?

She was acquainted with his antecedents, and had been urgently entreated to share his future with him. Responding to this entreaty she said:

"If there is anything which I have always held in contempt it is an aimless life, such
